Overview

- The fediverse is a collection of protocols, servers, and users.
- Together they form networks that can communicate together.
- Users can exchange short messages, blog-style posts, music, and videos throughout.

Some history

- In 2008, Evan Prodromou created a twitter-like service called identi.ca. It used the Ostatus protocol.
- In about 2012, he changed his service to use a new protocol, pump.io. He released the status.net protocol to the FSF, renamed as GNU/social. The fediverse continued along for several years.
- March 2016, Eugen Rochco (Gargron) created Mastodon, which used GNU/social with a tweetdeck-like interface. This gained some popularity.
- 2018, Activitypub, a new protocol was accepted as a standardized protocol. Most fediverse platforms have adopted it. Authored by Evan P., Christopher Lemmer-Weber and others, it expanded upon the previous into a better protocol.

Federation

- Most services are run by a single company or organization. A single silo that your data is trapped in, the only way to share with others is to have them join that service.
- Federation allows users of different services to inter-operate with one another, without creating an account for each shared resource. (Largely)
- System operators can block other instances in case of egregious issues, and users can likewise block users or instances to improve their experience.

This bill naively undermines #encryption.

"Encryption is a powerful tool to protect private information like passwords and financial details. However, it also can be used by criminals..." - Sen. Durbin

Have you contacted your Senator to share your disapproval of this criminalization of #privacy?

Fediverse—Distributed Social Media Platform how-to

About this event

Mastodon is a fully open source social media platform, with no advertising, monetizing, or venture capital. Although each Mastodon server is independent of all other Mastodon servers, they can be federated for intercommunication with each other via a suite of standard protocols. Although most of us are also on the ubiquitous commercially funded social media systems, it's fascinating to consider implementing the possibilities of Mastodon. At our October 3, 2020 meeting, Bob Murphy will show how.

Conclusion:

- The Fediverse is a way to use the web in a more individual way, either by choosing an instance with a community that suits your needs, or running your own server, and making it exactly the way you want.
- It avoids the advertising, algorithms, and other unpleasantities that plague some other social networks.
